The March of Death.

J. WILL JACKSON. What is it of noise confused, in which my thoughts seem lost? Methinks I hear the ruthless feet of a mighty, you, hear its muffled murmur, like the wall of some mad ghost.

Can it be of storm so rude, thus pressing near my path?

Or may it be a dream profound, as it bodes
me coming wrath?
In undertones that grate the air,
Like lions waking in their lair.
Come forth, in stubborn answer told, "Tis but the March of Death!"

When, with thoughts that awe me still, I bend a listening ear.
For clank of steel on horses borne, or the tap of drum to hear.
No dread resound of cannonade,
Nor clank of tiel blazing fusilade.
Nor clank of steel on soldier worn, doth echo to me bear.

Why is it he cometh not with legions, strong and bold.

and bold.

Nor peals the trumpet blast of war, like the marshal'd foes of old?

In hollow words that fill all space—
That shake the earth in ev'ry place,
I hear, in solemn accents low, this speech, so grim and cold,—

"Death comes not in armor clad, with vaunting banner high—
Doest thou not hear his giant tread as he stalks to thee so night
With awful strides, both night and day,
In solitude he makes his way;
And, with his wilting, crumbling touch, all mundane life must die!"

Carter Sharp has returned to the the greatest care in preparing such proposed amendments to the organic laws of the State. That amendment exempted St. Louis, Kansas City and St. Joseph from its operation, and, therefore, was in plain conflict with the Constitution of the United States, in that it denied to all persons the equal protection of the law. The amendment was popular, and it is too bad
